Thanks very much for your letter of 12 July.

I am indeed very glad that you all liked the [redacted] I, too, think they are a fine couple and was sure that they would be well thought of in England.

I wrote [redacted] several days ago asking him for his specific recommendations as to whether or not you, Alice and Maxine would be transferred to the new post. What I actually was thinking of was that he might see fit to transfer you prior to the opening of the station on Cyprus. As you know, I would not feel too good about you all being in Cairo under present conditions. I do not like to make promises because there are so many unforeseen things which can happen which might preclude their fulfillment. However, short of making an actual promise, I do want you to know that it is my intention at this time that you as well as Alice and possibly Maxine will be transferred to the new station on Cyprus.

I am fully aware of the difficult circumstances under which you all have had to work in England, and I regret very much that I have not been able to do very much about changing those circumstances. The information given me while I was in London, i.e., that the cars were actually enroute, was completely erroneous. I think at this time one of them is actually enroute and the other is supposed to be delivered in August. I am sure that when they arrive if they are properly utilized they can make a great deal of difference in the morale of the staff.

I have no objection to your exploring the possibility of employment elsewhere if you care to. The Chief of the Personnel Branch has to sign the permission. I have requested that he sign a memorandum authorizing you to shop elsewhere and I will forward it to you as soon as I receive it. I have also called [redacted], in accordance with my promise to you when I was in London. I told him that if you should contact him or if he should care to contact you that I would have no objection. He asked me to advise you that he would see what was available and would contact you in the not too distant future.

I am sure that we can count on you to continue to do a fine job in London as long as you are there. I sincerely hope that your final choice will be to remain with us and go to the new station. I appreciate greatly your writing with reference to this matter, and I shall do anything at all reasonable to help you if I can.

Please give my regards to our mutual friends.

Sincerely,

L. K. White
